ABSTRACT

The importance of the press and freedom of speech in advancing democracy, good governance, and human development has become globally acknowledged. Unfortunately, violence against journalists in Indonesia and elsewhere is still on the rise despite being a vital requirement for the growth of democracy. In addition to encountering physical, psychological, and sexual harm, journalists also confront the legal consequences imposed by provisions of some Laws that can potentially subject them to criminal charges. This paper seeks to explain violent incidents and potential articles in the existing and the Indonesian New Penal Code, the Information and Electronic Transaction Act, and the Personal Data Protection Act that might be employed to criminalize journalists. The imposition of these laws may significantly impact press freedom, impartiality, and information integrity, as they are inextricably linked to press freedom and limit media independence. A normative legal approach is used in this study. Data were obtained from existing laws, online data, research studies, and contemporary books. The study employs a descriptive-qualitative analysis. The study's findings indicate that violence against journalists is prevalent in different parts of Indonesia. Journalists often encounter infringements upon their rights to access information by employing physical or psychological means such as intimidation, harassment, and other various forms of violence, including the possibility of being imprisoned by using articles stipulated in some Indonesian Laws. Threats of criminalization, violence and attacks against journalists will create a fearful climate for media professionals, impeding the free circulation of information, opinions, and ideas for all citizens.

1 INTRODUCTION

The right to obtain information is part of human rights. One way to obtain accurate, reliable, and objective information is to exercise freedom of the press through journalistic work. Despite being a vital requirement for the growth of democracy, unfortunately, violence against journalists in Indonesia and elsewhere is still on the rise. In addition to encountering physical, psychological, and sexual harm while fulfilling their journalistic responsibilities, journalists also confront the legal consequences imposed by provisions of some national laws that can potentially subject them to criminal charges. The imposition of these laws may significantly impact press freedom, impartiality, and information integrity, given that violence and the criminalization of journalists are inextricably linked to press freedom and media independence limitations.

Journalists play a very vital role in society. Witnessing war, investigating transnational crime, such as narcotics, human and firearm trafficking, investigating crime and corruption, and giving a voice to opposition groups and people seeking change are all journalist's roles if people want to take control of their lives and make decisions that may affect their communities.¹ Journalists are also essential in promoting and strengthening democracy.²

The rapid development of information technology over the past two decades has led journalists to various challenges, especially in carrying out their professional responsibilities, as today, anyone can use the Internet to get information swiftly and effortlessly. Even though any information may be easily shared and received by any individual, i.e., using internet or social media, some still rely on journalism to provide accurate, reliable, and objective information. The proliferation and ease of manipulating disingenuous information in the digital age indeed underscore the need to source reliable data. Disinformation, which can be loosely described as deliberately incorrect information³, is now spread by both state and non-state actors and impacts communities across the globe⁴. Today, the technological revolution has significantly altered how the public obtains news and information, dismantling the mass media's monopoly and leaving them with many challenges and obstacles. Journalism, once largely print-based during a time when most people desired to read newspapers, is now shifting to the Internet. The constant decline in print newspaper sales demonstrates that print journalism is gradually becoming obsolete and that some even consider it a dying art.⁵ Apart from the benefits, the digital age posed many challenges to all professions, including the work nature of journalism. As a result of the changes brought about by the rise of digital media and the Internet, many traditional news outlets/companies have had to lay off journalists. Today, most journalists can only anticipate part-time employment from such organizations. They should also be acutely aware of the competition from other news providers and the wide variety of online content.⁶

There has always been violence against journalists worldwide. It has existed for years in a variety of forms. In addition to the economic pressure, layoffs, time constraints, and competitive tensions with other internet content, the journalists' daily violence experience makes journalism much more difficult. For their work, investigations, political ideologies, or simply for being journalists, they are killed, kidnapped, injured, threatened, assaulted, intimidated, harassed, and insulted.⁷ In some countries, the violence is shifting online and manifesting as censorship and state surveillance of journalists.⁸ China, Ethiopia, Iran, and Syria are among the many fiercely autocratic countries where physical and internet monitoring of journalists is the norm, intending to intimidate the media and suppress critical coverage.⁹ Today, anti-journalist and anti-media, hate speech, and online harassment are currently the most debated and widely mediatized issues.¹⁰ The scope of violence has expanded from direct physical harm to online trolling, computer hacking of journalism professionals, geo-tracking, and data leaks.¹¹ Cyberbullying of journalists is now also going very personal, and female or minority journalists are the likeliest to be targeted or victimized.^{12,13} UNESCO found that nearly three of four women journalist respondents had experienced online violence.¹⁴ UNESCO reported that more than 1,200 journalists have been killed worldwide between 2006 and 2020, with nearly nine out of ten of these murders remaining unresolved in a court of law.¹⁵ As of the date of the Committee to Protect Journalists' annual prison census on December 1, 2022, 363 journalists were imprisoned for their work, setting a new global high and surpassing the 2021 record by 20%. Additionally, 67 journalists and media workers were killed throughout the year.¹⁶

Violence and criminalization of journalists are inextricably linked to suppressing press freedom and media independence. Comparable to what happened elsewhere, much violence has also occurred against journalists in Indonesia. In Indonesia, journalists were simply being jailed and sent to prison using some existing laws in Indonesia regarding insults, defamation, hate speech, and hostility articles.

Based on the situation, this paper tries to explain and record several instances of violence against journalists, as well as some articles in the existing Indonesian Penal Code, the New Penal Code, the Information and Electronic Transaction Act (ITE Law), and the Personal Data Protection Act that could be employed to criminalize journalists. Besides violence against journalists, the author will address the importance of legal safeguards for journalists, taking into account their imperative role in providing the public with reliable, accurate, and objective data and information and also their essential part in promoting and strengthening democracy. To exhibit the reality of the problems, the author will provide research findings titled "A Snapshot of Violence and Criminalization Against Journalists in Indonesia: Enhancing the Safety of Journalists."

2 METHOD

This study employed a normative legal approach. Data on violence against journalists was collected and compiled through research and report studies, internet data sources, as well as contemporary scholarly journal publications, and e-books. The data underwent analysis using the relevant national legislation, with particular emphasis on existing and newly enacted Indonesian Penal Codes, Information and Electronic Transaction Law (ITE Law), and Personal Data Protection Law. The research used a descriptive-qualitative analytic approach.

3 RESULT AND DISCUSSION

The number of scholarly papers addressing the issue of violence and criminalization experienced by journalists in Indonesia is somehow limited. However, several reports or documents about particular cases of violence committed against journalists persist. Respected press organizations like ⁵⁷the Alliance of Independent Journalists, the Press Legal Aid Institute (LBH Pers), the Indonesian Journalists Association (PWI), and reports from online media platforms primarily documented these investigations.

Scholarly publications, for example, include Nuraryo's (2020) paper,

“Intimidation of Regional Journalists: A Driving Factor and Psychological Implications.” This article discusses the effects of intimidation directed toward journalists, which may result in psychological trauma, resentment, and fear while journalists conduct their journalism work.¹⁷ The title of another academic paper by Tawulo et al. (2018) is “Symbolic Violence Against Local Media Journalists in Kendari City.” This research elucidates the use of non-physical forms of violence to instill fear in journalists, employing methods beyond linguistic means. These methods encompass non-verbal communication methods, including gestures, physical proximity, facial expressions, body positioning, and linguistic means involving spoken words or talk. According to Tawulo et al., while speech may not directly cause physical injury to others, it is regarded as an effective means of expressing symbolic violence. The manifestation of verbal violence in this context takes the form of employing emphasis, pauses, and intonation to cause emotional harm and exert psychological effects on journalists.¹⁸ A different publication titled “Independent Journalists Alliances' Advocacy for Journalists Victims of Violence in Malang” was written by Suhardi (2019). This article explores the AJI's efforts to advocate for cases of violence against journalists. In this study, Suhardi's findings indicated that many journalists needed a better understanding of the code of ethics. Furthermore, it was observed that these journalists tend to discontinue cases involving violence prematurely. The press companies should also demonstrate more proactivity in monitoring the advocacy activities undertaken by journalists' peer groups.¹⁹

Compared to prior publications, the present article highlights the topic of violence and criminalization encountered by journalists in Indonesia, underscoring the imperative requirement for enhanced legal safeguards to be extended to this professional group. In addition to elucidating the prevailing conditions of violence and criminal charges in Indonesia, the author will also address some noteworthy aspects of the global phenomenon of violence against journalists. Furthermore, this study will review the articles within Indonesian laws and regulations that can potentially bring criminal charges against journalists and highlight the necessity of providing legal safeguards to journalists in performing their journalistic roles.

Freedom of expression and thought is a fundamental right for every individual, and freedom of the press is integral part to it.⁵⁴ In his speech on world press freedom day 2022, Secretary General of the UN António Guterres stated “Without freedom of the press, there are no real democratic societies. Without freedom of the press, there is no freedom.”²⁰

Press freedom contributes to the dissemination of information and the establishment of a democratic, transparent, and open society. Oemar Seno Adji stated that the rule of law views human rights as essential, where the right or freedom to think and speak is a vital and indispensable element that will guarantee freedom of the press as a democratic right, as a ‘central meaning,’ and as a right that drives other human rights issues²¹. According to Wahyu Wibowo, the most fundamental human right in upholding justice and truth, promoting public welfare, and educating the nation’s life is the right to freely express one’s thoughts and opinions.²² Ali Moertopo also emphasized that press freedom is a manifestation of human rights, specifically the freedom of written expression.²³

public health or morals.²⁶ In addition to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the international community has issued several publications, handbooks, and special instruments to protect journalists, including global and regional declarations, resolutions, guidelines, executive board decisions, regional measures, and periodic information.²⁷

In Indonesia,²⁹ Article 28E paragraph 3 of the 1945 Constitution of the Republic of Indonesia (1945 Constitution) states that “everyone has the right to freedom of association, assembly, and expression of opinion.”²⁸ Freedom of expression is the central pillar of democracy that needs to be upheld and is necessary for individual freedom, societal transformation or social change, community development, and government policy-making. Moreover, according to Article 28F of the 1945 Constitution, “everyone has the right to communicate and obtain information, to develop his personality and social environment, and to seek, obtain, possess, store, process, and convey information through all types of available channels.”²⁹

Freedom of expression of thoughts and opinions in Indonesia has also been regulated and protected by Law Number 9 of 1998 concerning Freedom of Expression in Public Space³⁰ and Law Number 39 of 1999 concerning Human Rights.³¹ In addition, to protect everyone’s right to information, the Indonesian government stipulated Law Number 40 of 1999 concerning the Press³² and Law Number 14 of 2008 on Public Information Disclosure.³³

Law Number 9 of 1998 was promulgated immediately after the fall or collapse of the ‘New Order’ authoritarian regime, which had been in power for more than 30 years and was highly restrictive concerning freedom of expression and press. Although not explicitly regulating journalists’ rights, this law has ensured that anybody can freely express their opinions and thoughts as long as they respect the rights and freedoms of others, public morality and order, and the welfare of society.

Article 14, paragraphs (1) and (2), of Law No. 39 of 1999 strengthens and safeguards the right to obtain and disseminate information. Article 14 states: (1)

7 Everyone has the right to communicate and obtain the information needed to develop his personality and social environment; (2) Everyone has the right to seek out, obtain, possess, store, process, and convey information using any available means.

Moreover, Article 4, paragraph (1) of Law No. 40 of 1999 concerning the Press recognizes freedom of the press as a human right. Protection of press freedom is also regulated in Article 4, paragraphs (2) and (3), which state that the National Press is not subject to censorship, banning, or broadcasting bans and has the right to seek, obtain, and disseminate ideas and information to guarantee press freedom. In paragraph (4), journalists have the right to refuse or disclose news sources' names or other identities.

Following Article 4, journalists also have several obligations outlined in Article 5, i.e., reporting events and opinions that comply with religious norms, societal decency, and the presumption of innocence, and serving and upholding someone's right to reply and correct any news. Briefly, under the Press Law, a journalist is obliged to correct or rectify any incorrect information, data, facts, or opinions reported by them. The distinction between the right to reply and the right to rectify journalistic work is the authority of the party requesting it. The right to reply is given to the party disadvantaged by news reporting; meanwhile, the right to correction is given to everyone. The right to reply includes someone's response to any news directly harmed by or affected by the information. Vice versa, the right to rectify or correct encompasses corrections from any individual regarding inaccurate data, particularly regarding facts and technical details.

Finally, concerning the right to information, Law No. 14 of 2008 explicitly states that the right to access information is a human right and that public information disclosure is a means of optimizing public oversight of the administration of the state and other public bodies, as well as everything that impacts the public interest. Consequently, according to this legislation, journalists can acquire any necessary public information that does not contravene any relevant legal provisions.

B. Global Situation Regarding Press Freedom and Violence Against Journalists

Even though the law regarding the rights and freedoms to information and the safety of journalists has been developed internationally and nationally, these issues still need to be addressed continuously.

According to Freedom House, in 2016, press freedom worldwide took a step backward due to new threats to journalists and media outlets in major democracies. In 2016, only around 13% of the global population resided in a country with solid press freedom, journalists' safety was ensured, state interference in media affairs was minimal, and the press was not subject to legal or economic pressures.³⁴ In 2016, the situation reached its lowest point in 13 years. A dreadful track record might be directed toward Russia and China, which repeatedly threaten journalists and restrict media freedom.³⁵

The robust findings received from South Asian countries reported by the International Federation of Journalists (IFJ) suggest that freedom of the press and expression is being restricted in many countries in this region. Contradictory laws aimed at suppressing dissenting voices or viewpoints interpreted as threatening or undermining state security continue to erode constitutional protections for independent media.³⁶ Reporters Without Borders ranked Indonesia's press freedom as 124th out of 180 nations in 2018 and 2019, 119th in 2020, 113th in 2021, 117th in 2022, and 108th in 2023, indicating that it remains at a poor level.³⁷ Despite falling to 117th place in 2022, Indonesia's status in the press freedom index is improving, and in 2023, Indonesia is ranked 108th out of 180 nations surveyed.³⁸

In African nations, safety conditions for journalists are identical to those in other regions. According to IPI's Death Watch, 25 journalists have been killed in targeted attacks in sub-Saharan Africa between 2016 and 2021, including seven in the last eight months of 2021. In the vast majority of cases, no arrests have been made as of yet.³⁹ It has been difficult for journalistic organizations, press freedom groups, and civil society organizations to persuade policymakers to prioritize journalist safety and press freedom. Governments elsewhere have passed new laws and regulations to stifle independent media while ignoring demands to end impunity for crimes committed against journalists.

In reality, the threats against journalists, do not just occur in authoritarian, developing, and former communist countries. Instead, these incidents also take place in various democratic countries and regions, such as Australia, the United States, and European countries. In Australia, whistleblowers and journalists are being investigated for exposing classified information in the public interest. Several of these investigations have resulted in major criminal charges.⁴⁰ Even being recognized as a press-friendly country, the United States also experienced a minor decline in press freedom.⁴¹ In European countries, journalists' hardships in the last decade also demonstrate that their societal function is not valued or respected.⁴² ⁴ The International Federation of Journalists claimed 68 deaths of journalists and media personnel in 2022, while Reporter Without Borders, a media monitoring organization based in Paris, recorded 12 murders and 556 journalist detentions in 2023. In addition to death, journalists continue to face various forms of violence, including harassment, terror, computer attacks, and even sexual assault.⁴³

The issue of protecting journalists does not only exist under normal circumstances. Journalists also face danger and need protection in particular conditions, such as war or armed conflict. Many factors raise the risks of reporting about war/conflict. During the military battle i.e., in Iraq, 42 died in 2003; 69 died in 2006 with a total loss of 170 since April 2003. The proportion of losses among journalists reported was higher than the loss of the coalition of armed forces⁴⁴, and hundreds more were arrested, threatened, or attacked.⁴⁵ The unpredictable hazards of bombs, the deployment of increasingly sophisticated weapons, and belligerents that care more about winning the war than the safety of media personnel have been added to the conventional dangers of war and to journalists.⁴⁶

It is essential to recall that only two journalists died while covering the First World War over its four years of brutal bloodshed. Two journalists were killed in Lebanon in 1979, and 63 deaths throughout the Vietnam wars in about two decades. In Syria's Islamic State, ISIS has made the torture and execution of journalists part of their public campaign plan, believing that such crimes will draw media attention.⁴⁷ In addition, journalists and their families have often had to live in a climate of terror after receiving warnings that they are targets to be killed.⁴⁸

In addition to male journalists, according to UNESCO,²⁴ 73 percent of women journalists had been threatened, intimidated, and insulted online regarding their work. The failure to investigate often² has real-life consequences for women journalists, affecting their mental and physical health. Online threats can sometimes escalate to physical violence and even murder. On a global scale, journalists are tragically losing their lives at a rate of one every four days. According to a report by UNESCO, the number of journalists who lost their lives in 2020 due to their professional activities amounted to 62. From 2006 to 2020, more than 1,200 individuals working in the media field were killed. In most cases, the perpetrators of crimes escape legal consequences or go unpunished.⁴⁹

Considering the situation, the global press freedom index has declined due to ongoing violence against journalists. In 2023, the situation of press freedom in 180 countries and territories,⁵ according to the World Press Freedom Index, is “dire” in 31 countries, “difficult” in 42, “problematic” in 55, and “good” or “satisfactory” in 52 countries. In other words, the environment for journalism is “bad” in seven out of ten countries and satisfactory in only three out of ten.⁵⁰ Seeing the situation, journalists worldwide are still facing high levels of disrespect and violence, which could have only been matched by the sheer bravery of courageous journalists who put their lives at risk to champion press freedom.⁵¹ Given the circumstances, there is an urgent need for journalist protection to establish press freedom as well as fulfill everyone’s right to information.

C. Journalist Violence and Criminalization Incidence in Indonesia

Comparable to what happened elsewhere, much violence has occurred against journalists in Indonesia. One of the most phenomenal cases and considered a dark history of the world of journalism in Indonesia is the death of Bernas Yogyakarta journalist ‘Udin’ or Fuad Muhammad Syafruddin on August 16, 1996. He died during the New Order authoritarian regime. He was allegedly murdered for his aggressive report of corruption, collusion, and nepotism, which were ‘taboo’ to discuss at that time. The legal apparatus never revealed the mastermind behind Udin’s death. Moreover, the essential evidence—his clothes containing blood

⁵⁸ According to the Alliance of Independent Journalists (AJI), there were 1.019 incidents of violence against journalists between 2006 to 13 of August 2023.⁵³ Violence against journalists, according to AJI, was carried out by various community groups, including police officers, government officials/apparatus, presidential security forces, ministerial protocol staff, members of the military, mass organizations, political parties, lawyers, company staff, community groups, university bureaucrats, residents engaged in clashing, debt collectors, even football supporter, and some other subject who were not identifiable.⁵⁴ Physical violence, such as beatings and slappings, remained the most common types of violence. In 2018, there were two new types of cases of journalist violence in the form of tracing and dismantling journalists' identities on social media for negative purposes when journalists wrote news that did not match the perpetrator's political aspirations, which AJI classified as doxing or online persecution.⁵⁵ During a protest against the Omnibus Law in October 2020, AJI, for instance, documented 28 incidences of police violence against journalists in various parts of Indonesia.⁵⁶ The COVID-19 pandemic characterized the year 2020-2021. Despite the implementation of large-scale social restrictions nationwide, the number of incidents of violence against the press is still relatively high. Digital attacks are increasing due to media coverage, which fosters a sense of social control over government actions in response to the Pandemic in Indonesia.⁵⁷

The data shown in Table 1 demonstrates the range of forms that violence against journalists can take, encompassing physical abuse, threats of violence or terror, restrictions on journalism coverage, destruction of reporting data, verbal intimidation, censorship, assault, digital attacks, and sexual violence. The acts of violence directed at journalists have resulted in physical harm and have also had significant psychological consequences or trauma.

In addition to AJI's data above, according to the LBH-Pers, physical and non-physical violence against journalists is common and keeps on increasing. In 2014, there were 72 incidents of violence; in 2015, there were 50 incidents; and in 2016, there were 83 incidents.⁵⁸ In 2022, LBH Pers recorded at least 51 incidents of violence against the press, both directed at the media, journalists, informants, press activists, and student journalists engaged in journalistic work at the campus. There were at least 113 individuals and organizations affected by the 2022 incidents. Seven of the 51 incidents at stake were attacks on student press activity, six targeted institutions, and one directly targeted nine college journalists who were members of the student press institute reporting student activists posting complaints about sexual harassment on their campus (LPM Lintas).⁵⁹

How about the deplorable condition of violence against female journalists? 82.6% (704) of female journalists, at the end of 2022, according to a survey of 852 female journalists conducted by AJI and PR2Media had experienced sexual violence or harassment at some point throughout their careers. They are offline and online body shaming, catcalling, sexually offensive or derogatory comments, receiving sexual and explicit text messages and audio-visuals, unwanted sexual or physical touch, being forced to touch parts of the body related to sexuality or serve the perpetrator's sexual desires, and being forced to have sexual intercourse. In addition, some female informants confessed to having experienced sexual harassment or assault at work, both inside and outside the office, including at the hands of their colleagues and superiors.⁶⁰

An attack on journalists is an attack on press freedom and the public's right to obtain information.⁴ According to Ade Wahyudi, the Director of the Indonesian Pers Legal Aid Institution, ten journalists experienced discrimination in 2020; two of them have received prison sentences from the district courts of Buton and Kota Baru, while the cases against the remaining eight are still pending. The imprisonment of the two journalists is a negative precedent for the country's press development.⁶² Meanwhile, according to AJI, of all 61 documented attacks against journalists and the media in 2022, five were arrested and accused of crimes of insult and defamation.

Due to the development of online news, the cases mainly employed for criminalization against journalists were Article 27, paragraph (3)³⁴ of Law Number 11 of 2008, juncto Law Number 19 of 2016, on Information and Electronic Transactions (ITE), regarding insults or defamation, and Article 28, paragraph (2), concerning hate speech or hostility.⁶³ Moreover, the threats of being criminalized (arrested and jailed) still haunt journalists in Indonesia using Article 65, juncto 67, Law Number 27 of 2022 on Personal Data Protection, the Existing Penal Code, and Law Number 1 of

One of Indonesia's newest laws, the Personal Data Protection Law, that can impede journalistic activity is Article 4, paragraph (2). This article governs seven forms of personal data, one of which is 'criminal record' data. As the act does not define the meaning of 'criminal record,' this section may impede the work of journalists who have frequently unearthed cases involving crimes or alleged crimes. This provision can be used to trap and punish journalists who investigate the track records of public officials suspected of corruption or money laundering, for example. The word 'unlawfully' or 'against the law' in Article 65, paragraph (2) of the Personal Data Protection Law is also prone to trapping activists and journalists because there is no explanation of the meaning of that phrase. Furthermore, subsequent to the enactment of the New Criminal Code, there has been a notable expansion in the range of provisions that might be employed to prosecute journalists. These newly included articles encompass offenses such as defamation of the government and state institutions, in addition to the preexisting offenses stipulated in the previous Criminal Code.

As mentioned above, some requirements for publishing journalistic work in Indonesia have been formulated¹⁷ in Article 5 Law No. 40 of 1999 concerning the Press. Journalists in Indonesia also already have a professional code of ethics. Therefore, there is no longer a justifiable rationale for suppressing the media due to defamation, slander, hate speech, or even hostility, provided journalistic activities have complied with the existing laws and ethical guidelines. Nevertheless, violence, intimidation, censorship, and imprisonment of journalists continue to be perpetrated by the state, legal apparatus, and other community members. In many cases, threats of violence and attacks against journalists are not properly investigated. The impunity will encourage the perpetrators of the crimes and simultaneously chill society, including journalists. Impunity⁶⁹ by covering up information on serious human rights abuses, corruption, and crime will damage whole societies.⁶⁴ Even though the challenges and perils journalists face in various countries vary from

Region to region, one sad fact remains: Our freedom of expression is questioned and challenged from many angles. Some challenges are apparent, others are hidden, and some employ conventional methods to silence free speech and critical voices. Some use new technologies to stifle and restrict the free flow of information and media pluralism, and far too many result in the physical harassment and murder of journalists.⁶⁵ Both then and now, threats of confinement or physical harm are meant to prevent people from speaking up, organizing, or fighting for what's right, and these threats are only going to get worse.⁶⁶

D. Legal Protections for Journalists

Under international law, such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the state, including Indonesia, has the obligation to respect, preserve, and fulfill human rights.⁶⁷ The responsibility to ensure protection necessitates that the state safeguard journalists from human rights violations. The violence against journalists' rights could manifest as substandard reactions, such as neglecting to commence comprehensive inquiries and taking legal action regarding incidents or mistreatment experienced by journalists. In addition, states are considered to violate journalists' rights when they fail to provide a safe and conducive environment to perform their professional responsibilities.

In the publication titled "How international human rights standards and mechanisms help protect journalists," the OHCHR states that the ICCPR contains a number of other obligations relevant to the safety of journalists. They are the right to life (Article 6) and the freedom from torture (Article 7).⁶⁸ States are further required to secure the right to a fair trial (Article 14) and protect individuals from arbitrary detention (Article 9). Further, Article 17 of the ICCPR mandates that states protect individuals' privacy against "arbitrary or unlawful" intrusion; this provision is crucial for safeguarding the private communications of journalists, as well as their access to and utilization of encryption and anonymity tools.⁶⁹

In addition to the right to information and press freedom related to public rights,⁴³ as stated in Article 27 paragraph (2) of the 1945 Constitution, every citizen, including journalists,⁵⁶ has the right to work and a decent living for humanity. This right necessitates the participation and presence of the state in its realization. This recognition is founded on understanding the relationship between⁶ the right to work and other aspects of human rights, such as the right to life and the right to be free from fear (right to freedom from fear), which is a fundamental element of human rights.⁷⁰ The inclusion⁶ of the right to work in human rights legal instruments encompasses not only a concept of philosophical relevance but also entails legal obligations that the state is obligated to respect, protect, and fulfill.⁷¹

No profession, according to Volker Turk, should carry the risk of being attacked, intimidated, or killed without appropriate resolution.⁷² Unfortunately, journalists encounter this on a regular basis. Concerning the issue of violence and the prosecution of journalists, it is essential to note that¹⁷ Article 28D paragraph (1) of the 1945 constitution also encompasses provisions on the rights of individuals to be recognized, guaranteed, and protected, as well as to get fair legal certainty and equal treatment under the law. Therefore, it is imperative for the state to safeguard the well-being of journalists, particularly in the context of violent acts, through comprehensive investigations into instances of violence perpetrated against them.

The guarantee of press freedom is causally linked to the protection of journalists. There is no sense in having press freedom regulations if journalists are not free to conduct their journalistic work and activities according to their profession, as freedom of the press is essential to protecting all human rights and citizens' rights. In fact, due to the work of investigative journalists, numerous cases of misuse of power, corruption, discrimination, and even systemic torture have been exposed worldwide and in Indonesia. Publicizing the facts²⁰ is often the first crucial step in redressing human rights violations and holding those in power accountable. Indeed, the purpose of press freedom is to fulfill the public's right to information.

Recalling the Secretary General of the UN, António Guterres, in his speech on World Press Freedom Day 2022, "Without freedom of the press, there are no real democratic societies. Without freedom of the press, there is no freedom." Indeed, violence against journalists may impact press freedom, impartiality, and integrity.³ Threats against one journalist can have the devastating effect of silencing many others. In 2022, on the occasion of²⁶ the International Day to End Impunity for Crimes against Journalists, Audrey Azoulay, the Director-General of UNESCO, stressed that² crimes against journalists have an enormous impact on society because they prevent ⁷⁰ According to Roosevelt (1941), the fundamental freedoms is included by the concepts of 'freedom from fear' and 'freedom from want'. It possess significant importance to individual life, including journalists life. people from making informed decisions.⁷³ Threats of violence and attacks against journalists, in particular, create a fear climate for media professionals, impeding the free circulation of information, opinions, and ideas for all citizens. Indeed, violence against journalists is a crime against freedom and democracy.

4 CONCLUSIONS

The way we see the world depends on the information we have. Information is the key driver of vibrant societies and human progress. The study showed that violence against journalists still occurs in Indonesia and across the globe. The violence harms the growth of democracy and violates the rights of citizens to obtain accurate, objective, and reliable information. The national constitution of the Republic of Indonesia guarantees the right to information. Several laws in Indonesia have also secured everyone's right to access information, including the right to seek out, acquire, possess, store, process, and convey information. In addition, Indonesia already has laws that grant journalists the rights and protections necessary to pursue and obtain information. However, in many cases, journalists' rights to obtain information are still being violated by various types of violence, such as beatings and slappings, intimidation, and sexual harassment, including the threat of detention, imprisonment, and even murder. Previously, those arrested and imprisoned were simply subjected to the laws of Law Number 11 of 2008 juncto Law Number 19 of 2016 on Information and Electronic Transactions (ITE), specifically Article 27, paragraph (3) regarding insults or defamation, and Article 28, paragraph (2) regarding hate speech or hostility. When it comes to the possible criminalization, arrest, and imprisonment of journalists while doing their jobs, the newest article is likely to be based on sections 65–68 of Law Number 27 of 2022 on Personal Data Protection, as well as various provisions outlined in Law Number 1 of 2023, which constitutes the Indonesian New Penal Code.

The recent difficulties and violence journalists have faced, especially in the last decade, show that their societal role needs to be respected. Indeed, not only do press freedom violations threaten democracy, but they also threaten the right to obtain information, thus making the issue relevant to all individuals. One should understand that violence against journalists is a crime against freedom and democracy. Literacy and journalist group empowerment is required to prevent and overcome this violence.
